BLOG DAY 2008

Posted on August 31, 2008 by Eddie

Category: Computing/Internet

Today Is Blog Day 2008 and bloggers are being asked to nominate new blogs which they find interesing. I'm going to nominate blogs which are new to me; though they may not actually be new blogs as such.

The first is the excellent blog by Ben Byerly about life as a theology student in Nairobi. I've linked to quite a few of Ben's posts over the past few months and will probably continue to do so. I hope to meet up with him and some of his fellow students in the next couple of weeks as they are studying in Cambridge for a few weeks.

Mark Sayers writes a lot of interesting stuff on his blog, but I have a small gripe that he doesn't allow comments, which rather defeats the object of the blogging medium.

White African by Hash is a great read: it looks at Africa with a strong technology and new-media bent.

Dr. Jim West deserves a mention if only for the sheer number and quirkiness of his posts. I don't always agree with what he writes, but I'm almost always moved either to amusement or thoughtfulness.

Last, but not least is the Wycliffe UK Blog, to which I am an occaisional contributer, though Mark does most of the work (how is that for getting two links in one?).

Technrati Tag: BlogDay2008