THEOLOGY: BLACK, WHITE OR GREY?

Posted on January 13, 2009 by Eddie

Category: Mission

It is well worth setting aside the time to listen to the discussion between post-modern Englishman Jonny Baker and Pentecostal Nigerian Yemi Adedji from last year's Greenbelt. These two look at the Christian faith from very different standpoints and yet demonstrate a very clear unity and close friendship. It is good stuff! There are a couple of things which strike me from their discussion, the first is Johnny Baker's suggestion that cross-cultural missions hold the key to helping to draw together Chritians of different backgrounds (for my view on this, take a look here).Â I was also struck by the implications of the different points of view on how we should think about doing mission. Tim Dakin of CMS (for whom both guys work) does a great job of comparing the discussion.

You can download the talk from the CMS website.

Hat Tip: TSK