The last few days have been very busy and I've not had much profound to say, but this story of a Kenyan man escaping from a python by biting it caught my eye.

> When the snake coiled itself around his upper body, Mr Nyaumbe resorted to desperate measures.
>
> "It waggled its ragged and scary tail on my mouth. I had to bite it as I struggled, one hand incapacitated," he told the paper.
>
> The python dragged him up a tree, but when it eased its grip, Mr Nyaumbe said he was able to take a mobile phone out of his pocket and ring for help.

You can read the whole thing here while admiring his sang froid. I have to admit that I've bitten python too, but only when it was cooked and in a hot pepper sauce.
