DRIVING

Posted on January 31, 2007 by Eddie

Category: Observations

The road from Naimey aiport to the city centre is a fairly busy dual carriageway. There is one petrol station on the road, on the side where the traffic is heading out of the city. So, when you are in a car heading into town from the airport and you need petrol what do you do? Well, the driver I was with today reckoned that the best way was to cross the carriageway and drive for a hundred yards down the wrong side of the road in the face of uncoming traffic to get petrol and then another two hundred yards on the way out of the garage before crossing back onto the right side of the road.

I've always thought that driving to and from airports was more dangerous than flying - as of today, I am firmly convinced that this is true!