CHURCH LENDER

Posted on April 20, 2007 by Eddie

Categories: Church: UK, Observations

Being of a thrifty frame of mind, I was interested to come across this new service.

> Churchlender has been set up as a non-profit website to enable churches and Christian individuals to contact each other in order to share resouces. Apart from the biblical principles behind sharing, there are a number of practical advantages to working together:
>
> - Financial outgoings are reduced enabling resources to be allocated elsewhere
> - Interdenominational relationships are established - wouldn't it be great if a relationship which started over the loan of a tea urn led to a multi-church mission in an area?!
> - The church as a whole consumes less resources which has an environmental benefit.
>
> Please note the following:
>
> - Churchlender exists merely to enable groups/individuals to contact each other. No responsiblilty or liabilty is accepted for any transactions that occur once contact is made.

Sounds like a good thing to me. While on the subject of things thrifty, Paul Shaddick has just posted about a scheme to save money using Quidco.