YOU WON'T BELIEVE WHAT HAPPENED NEXT!

A bit of news and a clickbait title.
Category: Observations

I thought I'd do a really click-baity title for this one, something I've tended to do over the years.

Today is the first of October and a couple of things happen this month. Firstly, I in a couple of weeks, I'm due to hit retirement age and I should get my free bus pass (I'm already working out running routes that I can link up by bus in the Dales). Secondly, October is the month when I have to pay the domain and hosting fees for Kouya.net.

My plan is to pay for the website this year, but in a year's time, I will cancel the standing order and after almost 20 years, this blog will vanish from the Internet. I'll undoubtedly post a few things between now and then; I have a book review or two to do and Rev, Dr, Prof Avril Poisson will probably have some stunning new discovery in the Spring.

I will find a way to make the reports that I do on mission agency finance and such like available online, but the blog itself will go the way of all flesh. I did start producing archives of the blog and making them available for a small fee. However, it takes a lot of work to produce the archives and the take up has been more or less non-existent, so I've decided to stop after producing the first four of a planned ten volumes. To be honest, it's been a bit discouraging. If you are interested you can find the archives here or for Kindle.

Over the next few days, I will install a plugin that makes it possible for you to download individual blog posts as Word or PDF files; it will look a bit ugly, but it works.

On a related note, as I've mentioned previously, I have listed an awful lot of my books for sale on the site. So far, I've only posted about half of the ones I want to sell, but again, the take up has been very limited (thanks to those who have bought books), so in the next month or so, I'm going to withdraw them from here and sell them through an app. This isn't my first choice as I'll make less money and the books won't go to people I'm connected to, but needs must. Anyhoo, if you are in the market for mission books or if you know someone who might be interested, this is the place to look.
