THE PROBLEM WITH BEING MISSIONAL

Posted on July 8, 2008 by Eddie

Category: Mission

Mark Sayers hits the nail on the head with a superb post about the church in the West:

> There is much discussion at the moment about the missional movement. The realisation that the church is on a back foot in the West continues to push leaders to develop solutions that will ensure that the church has a future. Therefore if you head down to your local Christian book store, you will find volumes ofÂ titles on howÂ your church can become more missional. At anytime there is probably a bunch of Christian professionals somewhere running a conference onÂ missional church and engagement with secular culture. At this time all over the world Christian bloggers are pressing publish on hundreds if not thousands of missional blogs, where discussions about how the church can share its good news, occur in a kind of professionalÂ dialect that is almost unintelligible to the average person.
>
> But there is a fat, stinky pink elephant sitting in the middle of the missional conversation that everyone is ignoring. The majority of ordinary ChristiansÂ are suffering a loss of confidence in their faith, this is particularly true of young adults who in the past were at the front ofÂ missional movements. Read More