RELATIONAL DEPTH AND BREADTH

Posted on July 20, 2008 by Eddie

Categories: Christian Life, Computing/Internet

Sorry that I haven't posted much in the last few days, moving house has taken a good deal out of both Sue and I. Anyway, in the absence of any sensible thought from me; I can refer you to this excellent post from Mark Sayers.

> However today with our tremendous relational breadth, we have little relational depth. Sure you might be able become friends with someone in Iran, and talk chat online with them aboutÂ your favouriteÂ album; but you have no idea what they get up to in their real life. They could sell crack cocaine from a school bus for all you know. We move jobs today often, we move homes, we even move cities, many rarely see family, we donâ€™t evenÂ know the names of the people in our street. This creates tough turfÂ for the growth of the gospel.
>
> In orderÂ for the gospel to grow again, we need to match the breadth of our relationship, with depth of relationships.Â In our facebook world where it is possible to have a thousand friends on your page, but stillÂ sitÂ at home lonely. Part of our kingdom mandate is to go deeper withÂ people, to again create depth of relationship, the growth of the gospel depends on it. Read More